ILLINOIS WOMEN IN CONGRESS AND THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Overview

Ratification of the 19th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in 1920 opened the door for Illinois women to take an active role in government. In 1922, Winifred Mason Huck became the first woman elected to Congress from Illinois, and Lottie Holman O'Neill was elected to the Illinois House of Representatives. (She later also served in the Illinois Senate.)

Of 20 Illinois women who served in Congress since 1922, seven (Representatives Jan Schakowsky, Cheri Bustos, Robin Kelly, Lauren Underwood, Mary Miller, and Marie Newman, and Senator Tammy Duckworth) are currently serving. Representatives Schakowsky and Kelly also served in the Illinois House of Representatives.

Democratic Representative Cardiss Collins was the first African American to hold the party leadership position of Whip at Large in Congress. Representative Lynn Martin became the first Republican woman elected to a leadership position in the U.S. House, serving as Vice-Chairman of the Republican Conference. Carol Moseley-Braun, after serving in the Illinois House, in 1992 became the first Illinois, and first African American, woman elected to the U.S. Senate.

The tables on the following pages list numbers and percentages of women in each General Assembly. More information is available on members of recent General Assemblies than of earlier ones, due to the posting of such information for recent General Assemblies on the General Assembly website. Table 1 shows numbers of women in the 85th through 92nd General Assemblies (1987-2002) and the percentages they were of all members, based on Illinois Blue Book entries. The Blue Books list only one member per seat in each General Assembly. If a member left office early and the vacancy was filled during that General Assembly, the Blue Book lists only one person (the one who was serving when it was compiled) as holding that seat for that biennium.

* If an elected member resigned before being seated, her replacement is treated as having been originally seated.

The General Assembly website includes member lists showing the total number of legislators who served at any time during a given General Assembly. Table 3 on the next page counts all women who served due to either election or appointment. Thus, in several cases a seat is represented more than once in Table 3. For example, if a woman resigned and was replaced by a woman, the count in Table 3 includes both women. However, if one woman moved between the House and the Senate during a General Assembly, she is counted only once in Table 3.

The current partisan division of women in the General Assembly is 60 Democrats and 11 Republicans. The Senate has 25 women (42.4% of its membership). The House has 46 (39.0%). The 102nd General Assembly has 15 African American women, 10 Latina women, and 4 Asian American women.

This report lists Illinois women legislators from 1922 to the present. Members of Congress are listed in chronological order; General Assembly members are listed alphabetically due to their much greater numbers. Years of service are shown in parentheses. Appendix A lists the number of women in the General Assembly in each year since ratification of the 19th Amendment.

Women in Congress

HUCK, WINNIFRED MASON (1922-23). Republican from Chicago; served in House. A journalist and lecturer, she was the first Illinois woman to be elected to Congress, completing the term of her father, William E. Mason. During her 5 months of service in 1922-23, she sponsored the first Congressional resolution to establish a universal plebiscite on a primary declaration of war.

McCORMICK, RUTH HANNA (1929-31). Republican from Byron; served in House. She was the widow of Joseph Medill McCormick, an Illinois legislator and later Congressman at Large and U.S. Senator. She published the Rockford Daily Republic, and owned and operated a dairy and breeding farm in Byron. She was elected Congressman at Large in 1928. She was the first elected Republican National Committeewoman from Illinois, and chaired the first woman's executive committee of the National Republican Committee.
